Dear Hiring Team,

Building excellent content practices from the ground up is what I do. I do it well. Here's where I'd start at Agility.

I spent an evening on agilityrobotics.com and in the SPAC filings. As an outside observer, these are the five changes I'd go after first:

Give Digit a voice. The homepage introduces a product. It doesn't yet tell a story. Open with an intro video: "Hi, I'm Digit 5. I build cars and manufacturing lines. Sometimes they ask me to get coffee." Humanoid robots are cool. Everyone wants to chat with C-3PO. Let people meet Digit 5 before they read a spec sheet.

Build the blog that isn't there. Resources is split into press releases and technical content, with nowhere for search or AI answer engines to build domain authority. A blog is the feeder for both.

Formalize Executive Perspectives. Jonathan Hurst's voice is already on the Resources page. It's just not organized as a program. Pull internal and external thought leadership under one heading, mix text and video, and let leadership visibly lead the conversation instead of occasionally showing up in it.

Start a customer story program. You already have the proof points: Toyota, GXO, Schaeffler, Mercado Libre — real sites, real volume (GXO's Spanx facility alone has moved 100,000+ totes since mid-2024). Turn them into full customer stories. It's the best decision-level content there is, and customer voices carry more weight with media than anything you say about yourselves.

Get investor-ready before AGLT lists. The SPAC close means analysts, earnings calls, and a public audience that wasn't reading you six months ago. Whoever becomes "the trusted voice on humanoid robotics" during a going-public window keeps that position for years. That's a content-authority problem, not a content-calendar problem, and it's the one I'd want to own first.

And that's just for starters. I'd like to talk about the rest.

Best,

Taylor Bornstein
