Dear Hiring Team,

SASE buyers now get their first answer from an AI engine, not a search results page or a vendor's own site. That shift is the discovery problem this role is built to solve.

I've spent the last several months solving exactly that at Bolt.new. I diagnosed where we were losing ground in AI-answer visibility, then built and executed the content strategy to close the gap. We held the #1 spot for AI-answer visibility in our category. Own-domain citations grew from 786 to 1,809 in a single month, a jump from #9 to #5 among all cited domains.

The rest of the mandate is familiar too. At Mendix, I planned and executed a flagship research program: an original global survey that anchored an integrated campaign. It landed 75% more coverage than prior surveys and $10M in influenced pipeline. I ran that program alongside a five-agency PR operation spanning the US, UK, Benelux, DACH, and Singapore. None of them reported to me. I held every one to the same bar regardless of market.

I also build the infrastructure a content function runs on: editorial calendars, AI tooling, and the standards that keep quality consistent when I'm not reviewing every asset myself.

I'd welcome a conversation about where Cato's content already has the credibility to lead the category conversation, and where it doesn't yet.

Best,

Taylor Bornstein
