Dear Hiring Team,

Chartbeat, Tubular Labs, Lineup Systems, and FatTail each hold a different piece of the same story: how content performs, where it travels, and what it's worth. Here's the content opportunity I'd want to build against first:

Make the four products tell one story. Positioned separately, they read as a bundle of tools. Positioned together, this is the one company that can publish the full content-to-revenue picture — attention, distribution, and yield in one dataset nobody else has.

Turn that data into a flagship research program. Aggregated, anonymized engagement and yield data at this scale is the kind of proprietary dataset that makes news on its own — the shape of an annual State of Attention report that trade press cites on its own terms, not a survey competitors can shrug off.

Write it for the person making the budget call. The audience here is publisher and media-company leadership deciding where investment goes next. Content that's actually useful to that decision earns trust a traffic number doesn't.

I've built exactly that kind of program before: an original research campaign at Mendix that became the company's biggest earned-media and pipeline driver in a single year. I'd like to build this one.

Best,

Taylor Bornstein
